THE DYING GAUL

Playwright/screenwriter Craig Lucas (THE SECRET LIVES OF DENTISTS, LONGTIME COMPANION, PRELUDE TO A KISS) makes an audacious directorial debut with THE DYING GAUL, a fiercely original psychological thriller based on his play of the same name. Part SUNSET BOULEVARD, part Greek tragedy, THE DYING GAUL is a tale of lust, power, corruption, betrayal and revenge set in the seductive world of the Hollywood elite.

Peter Sarsgaard stars as Robert Sandrich, a fledgling screenwriter who has been living on the fringes, writing spec script after spec script to no avail. His life changes when he is offered a million dollars for his latest and most personal work – “The Dying Gaul,” the raw, autobiographical story of the death of his lover. But there’s a catch – the studio thinks the project will be much more commercially viable if Robert will only change the dead lover to a woman.

Making the offer is Jeffrey (Campbell Scott), a smooth, ruthless and sexually avaricious studio executive who seduces Robert with the intoxicating Hollywood cocktail of power, money and sex. Patricia Clarkson stars as Jeffrey’s wife, Elaine, a former screenwriter now ensconced in a Malibu villa with children, a housekeeper, and time on her hands. She brings the grieving Robert into the family fold, drawn by his talent and his pain. When Robert confides that he finds solace, both sexual and emotional, in the ghost-like world of chat rooms, the curious Elaine meets him there anonymously. As their online dialogue unfolds, she discovers that Robert and her husband are having an affair. The shock of that revelation – and the unexpected way she responds – sets off a dangerous series of deceptions, confessions and betrayals. Never sliding into the conventional histrionics of the thriller, THE DYING GAUL is infinitely more complex, as the lines between predator and prey, sadist and victim shift and blur.

Visually stunning, THE DYING GAUL contrasts the dazzling California sunlight that bleaches out the palm-lined movie studios and oceanfront estates with the cold and detached world of cell phones and computers. What emerges is a truly original post-modern Hollywood noir, unsettling, unpredictable and morally explosive. As John Cooper writes in the 2005 Sundance Film Festival program, “Lucas has honed a precise, interlocking plot that exploits his scalpel-sharp irony. THE DYING GAUL will push you to the edge of your seat, simultaneously unnerving you with its complexity and frightening you with its believability.”

THE DYING GAUL will have its world premiere at the Sundance Film Festival in January 2005.

About the Production

“It was the most joyful experience of my life!,” says acclaimed playwright/screenwriter Craig Lucas, who makes his film directing debut with THE DYING GAUL, a wicked, emotional roller coaster of a thriller set in the heady world of the Hollywood elite. Lucas had adapted several of his plays for the big screen, including PRELUDE TO A KISS and RECKLESS, but this was his first time behind the camera as well. Continues Lucas, “I thought it was going to be overwhelming, which it was, but in ways I could not have anticipated – I loved taking care of that many people and having the privilege of being able to express myself in collaboration with so many unbelievably gifted, skilled, committed artists.”

Although the film concerns a triangle that develops between two powerful Hollywood insiders and a struggling screenwriter, it is far from a simple, predictable story of crass, tasteless executives vs. the pure young artist. Says Lucas, “I think most people have a very two-dimensional image of movie people – that they’re greedy and self-serving and heartless. Sometimes it’s true but not everyone in Hollywood is that way. I wasn’t at all interested in playing into the received wisdom that people who make movies are stupid or venal because, in fact, my experience is that people who make movies love to make movies -- and love the art form.”

“But THE DYING GAUL is not a movie about moviemaking – it’s not DAY FOR NIGHT,” continues Lucas. “I wanted to play against stereotypes – the couple at the center of the story is everything that is appealing about Hollywood, they’re basically intelligent and kind and good at what they do. That was necessary so that they’d be appealing to the character of Robert, the screenwriter. He has no money, his lover has recently died. And the appeal of this world, this house, this sea, the safety – or at least the illusion of safety – that money can buy, is understandable. I always feel that the interesting and challenging thing when you’re making something to entertain people is not to tell them what they already think they know but to tell them what they don't yet know they know. Something that throws lights into a dark corner.”

This playing against stereotypes and expectations is part of what makes THE DYING GAUL such an edge-of-your-seat experience – just when the audience thinks that they've figured out the characters, one of them will do something unexpected, jolting the audience out of their complacency. “Let's face it,” says Lucas, “so much entertainment relies on stereotypes so that the artists don't have to work very hard. The fun part for me, whether I'm at the theater or watching a movie, is to have to engage, to be surprised, and to be taken on a journey into corners of lives that I didn't even know existed.”

Although Lucas had directed some theater, it was his good friend Campbell Scott, with whom he'd worked on LONGTIME COMPANION and THE SECRET LIVES OF DENTISTS, who persuaded Lucas to take the plunge into film directing. Recalls Lucas, “After DENTISTS came out, Campbell and George (Van Buskirk, who produced SECRET LIVES OF DENTISTS as well as THE DYING GAUL) were extremely insistent with me about turning ‘The Dying Gaul’ into a movie. And I put it off for a long time because I didn't know how to do it. But finally the fact that I didn't know how to do it was the thing that interested me.”

Naturally, Lucas had seen the play several times in various productions. As he recalls, “It was successful but successful in that it stirred people up. It upset some people terribly. I think other plays and movies had led audiences to expect someone who is grieving over a loss to AIDS to always behave nobly, as so much media intimates that suffering is ennobling whereas, of course, suffering breeds more injustice and cruelty. Audiences were not gambling on being confronted with anything like that. So it was a strange experience. I think it made me want to spend more time with the play. I wanted to understand why it affected people the way it did and I wanted to, frankly, see if I could tell the story better.”

A director himself, Scott was convinced that Lucas would be a natural at film directing, and his hunch proved right. “He wasn’t at all over-protective about what he does but, naturally, because he wrote it, he’s incredibly keyed into it. And he did not suffer from that first-time director wishy-washiness. He’s incredibly decisive. I’ve seen Craig’s plays many times and he always creates characters that end up being a lot more than they might initially appear to be. And that’s always what you want.”

Scott plays Jeffrey, the studio executive. Scott describes his character: “Jeffrey has a very powerful position at one of the studios but we go out of our way to not make him a cliché, the way we think of studio execs as these greedy, slimy characters. He’s a lot more complicated than that although he is deceptive -- but all three characters are.”

“He was a lot of fun to play,” continues Scott. “During the first half of the movie, he’s incredibly on top of it. He has a great wife and he starts this relationship with a man. He’s bisexual and he loves having a lot of everything. He doesn’t seem to live in a world where there are rules telling him he can’t do things like that. So he embraces it and then of course it unravels and all hell breaks loose. The great thing about this character is that he thinks he’s controlling everything and then, about halfway through the movie, you realize he’s not anymore. Things are beginning to control him.”

Scott continues, “Because of Robert’s talent and his being a very attractive, humorous man, and a very deep character, Jeffrey finds him very attractive. And it all starts off kind of like a goof but then it gets deeper than that. And although Jeffrey remains dedicated to his family, he also gets in a little over his head with this guy. And then Elaine and Robert fall for each other too because she’s a writer as well and they meet on that level. It’s a cool triangle because everyone’s equal. Patti brings a lot of power to this woman who ultimately also unravels. And Peter’s character starts off kind of at a loss, opposite from us, and then actually gets stronger. How he does it is a little strange but he actually ends up being kind of the most stable of us all...in a kind of tragic way.”

For Lucas, Scott was the perfect actor to play this very complicated character.

“Campbell has a great understanding of storytelling. He’s not interested in cheap effects and he doesn’t do what I call ‘schmacting.’ ‘Schmacting’ is what usually wins the Academy Award. If you play a crazy person, an autistic person, a drunk or retarded person, that’s thought to be acting. The hardest thing in the world is to tell a story and never draw attention to what you’re doing. With Campbell, there’s a fluidity between his head and his emotions and his gut and his genitals! I’d work with him on anything.”

The award-winning Patricia Clarkson (THE STATION AGENT, PIECES OF APRIL, FAR FROM HEAVEN) stars as Jeffrey’s wife, Elaine, a former screenwriter whose comfortable life is shattered during the course of the film. She too praises Scott’s ability to play such a complicated character. Says Clarkson, “Campbell plays the duality of it, both feminine and masculine. He is both subtle and overt. He’s deeply emotional and passionate and yet quite reserved. He’s liquid.”

Craig Lucas was thrilled when Clarkson signed on for the role of Elaine. “85% of directing is good casting and to have Patti in this role was a dream come true,” he says. “Patti and I have been circling each other for about fifteen years. She did lots of readings of my plays in New York.”

Both Clarkson and Scott agreed about their approach to their characters. Says Lucas, “She and Campbell were adamant about not villainizing these people, that the film was about three people who are all basically yearning to make their lives better and who somehow, when they come into combination with one another, an inevitable pull drags them into terrible places. And neither she nor Campbell were afraid of the overt sexuality in this story. I always felt that we couldn’t tell this story in front of a camera without really allowing their bodies and the way they use their bodies and the way they live in their bodies, to be fully expressed.”

The relationship between Elaine and Jeffrey is different than most marriages portrayed in American movies. Says Clarkson, “I think they’ve been married for awhile and they have a wonderful relationship. They’re both very bright and creative in their own ways. They stimulate each other in many different ways. They have a very European marriage, an open marriage which is a rare lifestyle in America. They’re both very free-spirited.”

Although Jeffrey and Elaine may have an atypical marriage, Jeffrey’s affair with Robert shocks Elaine and her response sets off a tragic chain of events. She learns of the affair when she anonymously meets Robert online in a gay chat room. Says Clarkson, “I think in life we always do things for many reasons. Our actions are the result of sometimes several emotions and several impulses. Elaine ventures into the chat room and starts emailing Robert initially out of curiosity and it suddenly becomes something else.”

Peter Sarsgaard, who most recently won acclaim for his performances in KINSEY and GARDEN STATE, plays Robert, the grieving young playwright who becomes entangled with Jeffrey and Elaine. As Sarsgaard says, “It’s a very painful thing that Robert is going through over the course of the film. He’s basically agreed to chop off his left arm for a million dollars. The film he’s written is about two men in love, one of whom has AIDS. And Jeffrey wants Robert to change it to a man and a woman. And Jeffrey and my character end up having an affair, which is ironic – Jeffrey’s asking Robert to make his screenplay not homosexual and then he has a homosexual affair with him.”

Robert’s screenplay is entitled “The Dying Gaul,” inspired by the famous Roman statue depicting a wounded Gaulic warrior who lies on the ground awaiting death. Although it was the Romans who fought the Gauls in the third century B.C., the Roman sculptor displays not triumph but sorrow at the horror and senselessness of war. “Elaine is a real artist and she understands what the screenplay is trying to say,” explains Sarsgaard. “And her husband, Jeffrey, gets it too but he’s more interested in the realities of the world, which is something that I’ve been told as an actor over and over again. As actors, I think all three of us identify with what it means to try to hold on to the thing you love dearly. And also to quite easily throw it away for the right amount of money.”

For Sarsgaard, working closely with Lucas was “very interesting because he has experienced a lot of the things that happen in the script. Craig has so much compassion for actors. He is absolutely, hands-down the most supportive director I’ve ever worked with. He’s one of the most intuitive people I’ve ever met and he has no ability to withhold information from you. So you never feel like he’s lying, he’s incredibly direct. He’ll come up and tell you what he’s thinking, which I love.”

Clarkson too has nothing but praise for Lucas. “I like working with a writer/director because it’s one voice. Great writing is always a challenge but a good one. And frightening – you have to rise to it. You have to be prepared and you have to be available emotionally and intellectually. And for this film, you have to wear a white bikini. Oh my God – that was the most challenging thing of all!” laughs Clarkson.

Since he had never directed a film before, Lucas says, “I invited everyone to engage in the most communication possible, from beginning to end. I made no secret of being a first time director, asked everyone to watch my back, and encouraged them to speak out if I was making what to them seemed to be a misjudgment of some sort. Once we talked about the depth of the characters and what were the most essential qualities in each scene to be pulled into the forefront, each of the collaborators had specific notions about how to accomplish that, and if they didn’t, then I resorted to making suggestions. We changed our minds about a lot of things along the way, and I continued to treat the set as a fluid place of group discovery. I find that if you invite people into your process along with knowing your own point of view, you have then the best of both worlds -- collaboration and self-expression.”

For Lucas, making THE DYING GAUL was an unexpected joy. As he recalls, “I had worked on stage for many years with a great director who died in ’97. And so I wasn’t having this experience I expected to have for the rest of my life, working with this director. So in the late ‘90’s, I started directing myself. And I found that I came alive and I enjoyed it and I had things to offer actors and to other collaborators that I didn’t even know I had. What a strange thing to happen when you’re 50 years old -- I’m probably the only first-time 52-year-old movie director!”

THE DYING GAUL joins a long list of dark, incisive movies about screenwriters in Hollywood, from such classics as Billy Wilder’s SUNSET BOULEVARD, Nicholas Ray’s IN A LONELY PLACE and Vincente Minnelli’s THE BAD AND THE BEAUTIFUL, to such recent films as THE PLAYER, BARTON FINK and ADAPTATION. And like the best of those, THE DYING GAUL explores the dangerous dynamics that can come into play in a world where ideals are sacrificed in the name of commerce and where the lure of sex, power, money, and glamour are almost irresistible. Says Lucas to those about to see his film “Enjoy -- and forgive me if your sleep is ruined.”

PETER SARSGAARD (Robert)

An actor noted for his ability to access what is behind the often complicated facades of the characters he plays, Peter Sarsgaard will add to his burgeoning reputation with roles in several projects due for release over the next year.

He is currently shooting JARHEAD, Sam Mendes' adaptation of Anthony Swofford's best-selling Gulf War memoir. Sarsgaard plays Troy, a member of an elite Marine sniper

In Fall 2004, Sarsgaard completed production on THE SKELETON KEY. Penned by Ehren Kruger (THE RING) and directed by Iain Softley, the New Orleans-set story follows a young woman, played by Kate Hudson, who begins to experience eerie occurrences in the home of the elderly couple for whom she's caring. Sarsgaard plays the love interest of Hudson's character, whose initial skepticism gradually turns to concern. Universal Pictures will release the film July 8, 2005.

Sarsgaard most recently completed production on the Disney/Imagine Entertainment-produced thriller FLIGHT PLAN, co-starring Jodie Foster. Directed by Robert Schwentke, the film follows an FBI agent who tries to help a woman find the daughter who has mysteriously disappeared during flight.

Reich is under an exclusive recording contract with Nonesuch, on which label "Different Trains" earned him one Grammy™ for Best Contemporary Composition and "Music for 18 Musicians" a second. His "documentary video opera" works "The Cave" and "Three Tales" (in collaboration with video artist Beryl Korot) have expanded the boundaries of the operatic medium.

Works by Steve Reich include "Music for 18 Musicians" (1974-76) for voices and ensemble; "City Life" (1995) for ensemble; and "Triple Quartet" (1998) for string quartet with pre-recorded tape, or string ensemble, or string orchestra. His latest work, "You Are (Variations)" for chorus and ensemble, jointly commissioned by the Los Angeles Master Chorale, the Ensemble Modern, and Lincoln Center, receives its European premiere in Frankfurt on January 12, 2005 and its UK premiere at the Barbican in London on January 18, performed by the Ensemble Modern and Synergy Vocals under Stefan Asbury.
